What is a Cryptocurrency Fund?

A cryptocurrency fund is an actively managed investment fund that pools capital from investors (usually individual retail investors) and invests in cryptocurrencies; often with complex portfolio-constructed strategies and sophisticated risk management techniques.

This allows investors' exposure to cryptocurrencies as an investment without requiring deep expertise in finance, cryptocurrencies, or an investment-related repertoire.

Cryptocurrency hedge funds are managed by a team of experts that is headed by an experienced fund manager, and is often re-balanced depending on market conditions.

The ultimate goal of this fund is to employ complex investment strategies in the pursuit of attaining financial returns that outperform other traditional markets.

Various types of cryptocurrency funds

Cryptocurrency Hedge Funds

Hedge funds employ risk-management (“hedging”) strategies to generate above-average market returns for investors, consisting of investing in publicly traded coins and tokens.

Cryptocurrency Venture Capital

Much like traditional venture capital funds, these funds invest directly into a cryptocurrency-related project or a blockchain-based enterprise. Venture funds will invest in the early (seed) stage, even before the coin is listed in any exchange.

Cryptocurrency Private Equity

This is similar to venture capital funds – the only difference being the entry stage of the investment. Cryptocurrency private equity funds will invest in a cryptocurrency or blockchain project that is much more mature, compared to when a venture capital fund might do so.

This is to ensure that the technology or applications promised by the project has been proven to work and is ready to scale, thereby reducing the risk exposure of the fund.

Although these are the three major categories of cryptocurrency funds, many funds employ a hybrid approach, by allocating funds to publicly traded cryptocurrencies as well as being a seed investor in other cryptocurrency projects.

WHERE WE ARE

The difference between where we are and where we want to be is created by the changes we are willing to make in our lives.

When you want something you have never had, you must do something you've never done before to get it. Otherwise, you will keep getting the same results.
